Uncle Vernon was pulling on his coat when Harry spoke to him. He stopped and turned, his fist raised, his face an ugly mess.

“If you sign my permission form,” Harry went on quickly, “I swear I’ll remember where I’m supposed to go to school and I’ll act like I’m normal and everything.”

Harry could tell that Uncle Vernon was thinking it over, even if his teeth were bared and a vein was throbbing in his temple.

“Right,” he snapped finally. “I shall monitor your behaviour carefully during Marge’s visit. If, at the end of it, you’ve toed the line and kept to the story, I’ll sign your bloody form.”

He wheeled around, pulled at the doorknob, and slammed the front door so hard that one of the little panes of glass at the top fell out.

Harry didn’t return to the kitchen. He went back to his bedroom. If he was going to act like a ‘normal’ person, he’d better start now. Slowly and sadly he gathered up all his presents and his birthday cards and hid them under the loose floorboard with his homework. But he didn’t have long to brood. In next to no time, Aunt Petunia was shrieking up the stairs for Harry to get ready to welcome their guest.

“Get the door!” Aunt Petunia hissed at him.

A feeling of great gloom in his stomach, Harry pulled the door open.

On the threshold stood Aunt Marge. “Where’s my Dudley?” she roared.

Harry’s cousin Dudley came waddling down the hall, his blond hair plastered flat to his head, a bow tie just visible under his many chins. Aunt Marge thrust her suitcase into Harry, knocking the wind out of him, seized Dudley in a tight one-armed hug, and planted a large kiss on his cheek.

Harry knew perfectly well that Dudley only put up with Marge’s hugs out of interest, and sure enough, when they broke apart, Dudley had a crisp note clutched in his fist.

They all proceeded into the kitchen, leaving Harry alone in the hall with the suitcase. But he wasn’t complaining; any excuse not to be with Aunt Marge was fine by him, so he began to heave the case upstairs into the spare bedroom, taking as long as he could.
